Modding has been a huge part of the Grand Theft Auto games on PC ever since Grand Theft Auto III debuted a then-new 3D engine and a much larger world. Because Rockstar doesn't provide any kind of formal editing tools, however, the end-user community took it upon themselves to create the necessary software. One of the most popular editing suites used in GTA V was a program called OpenIV, which supported database manipulation and could be used to create a vast range of gameplay changes, effects, and content swaps. If you've ever seen videos of the popular Vehicle Cannon mod, you've got some idea of how zany some GTA V modders are (and to be fair, it looks hilarious). OpenIV has been indispensable to the larger modding community, which why Take-Two's recent cease-and-desist order against the mod has sent players into revolt. The makers of OpenIV announced earlier this week that they had received an order from Take-Two's lawyers telling them to cease and desist from distributing their work. By extension, the hundreds of mods that relied on OpenIV are no longer functional, either. Take-Two claims that the entire issue is not because they are against modding, but supposedly because OpenIV interferes with Grand Theft Auto Online. The company released a statement, saying: Take-Two's actions were not specifically targeting single player mods. Unfortunately OpenIV enables recent malicious mods that allow harassment of players and interfere with the GTA Online experience for everybody. We are working to figure out how we can continue to support the creative community without negatively impacting our players. This explanation hasn't set well with many modders, who have noted that OpenIV was strictly a single-player mod system. There's supposedly no evidence that OpenIV interfered with GTA Online, which hasn't really seemed to need any help from modders when it comes to being a rampant hellhole of cheats and hacks. Few would argue Take-Two doesn't have the right to control its games and the modding situation in any way it pleases. But Rockstar has previously been supportive of the modding community, and this C&D clearly pissed off a lot of long-term players. Mod communities tend to keep a game alive and in the public eye much longer than it might otherwise be, and this very much includes GTA V. Not all mods are banned (trainers still work in single player), but OpenIV's strength was its ability to manage hundreds of mods at once. PC Gamer notes that modding fans have taken to Steam to vent their disapproval; only 21 percent of the 23,000 reviews left for GTA V in the past 30 days are positive. OpenIV was also used to produce machinimas based in GTA V, since it allowed for camera controls not implemented in the included game. Mods like LSPDFR, which transform GTA V into a law enforcement simulator, required OpenIV. The software still works if you already downloaded it, but can't be downloaded anymore. Baller, shot caller Rockstar announced today that it's going to give every player who has played or logs into Grand Theft Auto V Online this month $500,000 (about £313K, AU$527K) in virtual currency. The game developer called it a "stimulus package" for players who this month dealt with a troubled launch that made it difficult to log into the new GTA's much-hyped online mode. GTA V launched in September, but initially only the single player story mode was available; the online portion, which lets up to 16 players roam free in city-spanning gameplay sessions, launched at the start of October. But Rockstar's servers were quickly overloaded and many players found it impossible to get online or ran into bugs that corrupted their saved files and had other negative effects. A $500K olive branch Rockstar no doubt hopes the GTA$500K stimulus package will make up for that. "Given some of the recent technical issues during these first days of GTA Online, and now that things are starting to look much smoother (touch wood!), we are planning to provide a special stimulus package for all who have played or will play Grand Theft Auto Online this month," the developer wrote on its website and in an email sent to players this morning. In Grand Theft Auto V Online players can engage in jobs and missions with or against one another in the hopes of earning in-game cash to buy things like cars and apartments. It's like real life, if your job was to race planes and blow things up. GTA V Online: true realism! The stimulus package money will be deposited in users' in-game bank accounts, accessible through ATMs or their characters' smartphones, in two installments of GTA$250,000. The first will arrive "as early as next week," according to Rockstar. First the developer will confirm that issues causing players to lose progress have been fully fixed, though. After that, the second deposit will arrive at the end of October. To receive the cash, players need only log into Grand Theft Auto V Online any time during October and download an upcoming title update. That GTA$500,000 should be enough for most GTA V Online players to start living like ballers, creating a class of well-equipped high rollers with a competitive edge over new players who come in after the stimulus package goes out. In other words, GTA V Online is about to get even more realistic. Has the series still got it? The brand new trailer for Grand Theft Auto V has hit giving us our longest glimpse at the game so far. It's the second trailer of the game, which is expected in spring next year. So what can we glean from the new snippet? Well it's the usual mix of sprawling cityscapes, violence and tongue-in-cheek humour. The game world is bigger than the last two GTA titles and Red Dead Redemption combined. According to the creators, that's to allow more flying missions. The graphics look awesome, a real step-on from GTA IV. And fans won't be disappointed, as there are the usual insane-looking missions and snappy dialogue. One cut-scene sees a boy dangling from the ladder of a moving firetruck, a scene reminiscent of the end of a certain action movie. The soundtrack is reliably 80s as well, which suggests harking back to Grand Theft Auto: Vice City. In fact if there is a criticism, it's that the trailer is all cut-scenes with no in-game action. But it still looks terrific. Multiple views According to a recent report, missions will be scored just like scenes in a movie, as well as keeping the traditional radio stations. You'll also take control of multiple characters, offering more than one viewpoint on the action. Rockstar has also uploaded a huge batch of screenshots for our perusal. You can check them out here. Grand Theft Auto V is up for pre-order now, and should be out sometime next spring. We'd watch a show set in Los Santos and starring Clarkson, Hammond and May. The first full trailer for "The Grand Tour" recently debuted, and damn was it something. Jeremy Clarkson, Richard Hammond and James May are back and better than ever, thanks to a couple hundred million bucks from Amazon. But even without that sort of budget you can still put together an awesome car show starring the trio. Well, sort of. This fan trailer was created in "Grand Theft Auto V" and is basically an exact replica of the original. It's almost creepy just how customizable the virtual worlds of Los Santos and Blaine County really are. Fun fact: This isn't the first time the guys have been seen in "GTA V." While we really liked seeing Jeremy Clarkson shoot a minigun at a jumbo jet this video gets the nod from us for a few reasons. For starters, the character models are more accurate, as is the audio dubbing. We were also impressed by the tiny details, like the fact that in each scene virtual Clarkson, Hammond and May are dressed almost identical to their real-life counterparts. Then there are the cars and driving sequences. Although some liberties are taken with the locales, the virtual trailer almost perfectly syncs up with its source material. That shows us that a ton of time and effort were put into this production. That's no surprise as the person behind this video, YouTube channel GTA Wise Guy, also created the Paul Walker "Grand Theft Auto Five" tribute video. Image 1 of 5 GTA V is just around the corner and so to celebrate its impending arrival our crack design team have come up with this render of what we think the iFruit will look like. We know that GTA V (opens in new tab) will feature the iFruit - A fictional device which will let you see the game map and more - so in honour of the game's impending arrival and because well, it's a Friday, our design team came up with a concept render of what we think it'll look like. The first thing you'll notice is both its similarity to a certain Apple product, the iPhone 5 (opens in new tab), but also the similarity to the mobile device which was proudly featured in the original Grand Theft Auto V reveal poster. We know via previous iFruit iterations in the GTA series that you'll be able to answer calls and view the map, we now also know that the iFruit will be able to take pictures (opens in new tab) which can then be uploaded to Rockstar's Social Club. It seems logical that the next step is to include more deeply integrated apps, a few of which we've taken a guess at including a mobile store, remote-detonation app and an instant 'Pay'n Spray' for your beloved smartphone. Enough chat though, check out the video below and head over to Facebook (opens in new tab) to give us your thoughts. Are we way off the mark or are these features you'd like to see in the upcoming GTA 5?-----Sponsored Content:-----
