If your cashier control has been stolen, lost, or you don't need it, you can delete it and get the money returned to your bank account. The steps for deleting a check vary in the bank and depending on whether you have control at your fingertips. The reimbursement process can take about 90 days and can be subjected to cancellation fees. For more details on canceling the control of a cashier, see below. Before canceling your check, it is important to be sure that what he had really had a cash allowance. A cashier check is signed by a cashier or a cashier working in the bank and is usually supplied with a fee à € "usually around $ 10. The control funds are extracted from your control account before the control is created, so you never melt and can be used as money. [1] If you are not sure, ask yourself ask yourself: did you talk to a face cashier? Have you provided information on ID and Payee? Did you ask you to provide adequate documentation? Did you pay a fee for buying the check? Did you talk to the press and the sign, the stamp or has verified the check? Has a receipt was provided? If you answered these questions, you purchased a cash allowance. See below for the next steps. If you have control if you still have the bill, you can simply return it to your bank. In most cases, the detector instructs you on how to approve control, then provide a refund. The bank can deposit the funds on your account, offer a cash refund, or give a replacement control. [2] [3] While this sounds simple enough, the process is not always fast. The Bank can request a waiting period for deleting control before issuing a refund or replacement. Note that cancellation costs can also be applied. If you don't have control if you don't have control anymore, you will be asked to fill out forms at your bank that requires a repayment of the funds. Once again, canceling costs can be applied. If you want the bank to send you a replacement check, you will first need to buy compensation from an insurance company. [4] This is a type of specialized insurance that would make it responsible for the second check, rather than the bank. Compensation securities can be difficult to get, and many banks will make you wait anywhere from 30 to 90 days before you will emit a replacement control. [4] Another option for the lost or stolen controls of the cashier is to wait for 90 days from the date when checking the cashier was released and then present a declaration of loss with the bank. [5] Once the declaration has been made, the Bank can issue a reimbursement check. I don't think this could be like "on the spot" like an IMO check. How come it's not "on the spot"? It says, "I'll give you X." You say "Dear." Zombies and salesman walk into the bank. The vendor says at the counter, "Version X to Zombie's account." Zombie calls the bank five minutes later, the bank says, "Yes, Mr. Zombie, we have the funds." I doubt a cashier's check can be more "on the spot." Unless, the seller just happens to have a check in hand for the EXACT amount you two agree on. Otherwise, there is the requirement: "Can you keep the car for X cash while I go to the bank to check the tellers?" Have a written and notorized sales invoice and give the seller the keys. The seller goes to the bank and funds the wires, then the seller takes the title. All the wrong information in this thread. Seriously, are any of you guys making something up? A check of the cashier passes through the same banking system that a personal check does. This means it might take 3-5 days or more to cancel finally, depending on where the Federal Reserve Banks the deposit bank and the use of the design bank. This presupposes that both banks are in the United States. United. A check is deposited, even if the funds are available, which does not mean that the control has been canceled. The account of a cashier is generally not subject to a "stop payment". This does not mean that the check cannot be stolen or falsified. Keep in mind that "Stop Payment" is a special term - there are other ways to try to prevent a legitimate cashier's check from being paid, but the emission bank could be taking a big risk doing so. Banks cannot put stop payments on lost, stolen checks or cash checks Destroy a good way to control things is to call the bank directly that the cashier's check is designed. Ask them to check the check number, account number, Remitter, Payee (your name), and the amount. I put many calls like this when I worked in the bank. You can also ask your bank to do it for you. Remember to check the telephone number of the bank. Don't call the account number. One of our cashiers committed this error. $$ went away.
