If you're a beginner who's just venturing into stock trading alone, or even if you've been divulging the markets for a while but don't have a deep understanding of the many concepts associated with equity, you might find much of the terminology associated with stock trading vague or unclear. This is especially true when you are looking for the type of stocks to invest in the next or what type of mutual funds to buy when you submit a query about this dilemma online, you will find a variety of tips and opinions. Some may give you the names of securities or funds to raise later, while others may give you broader advice, such as investing in large funds or steering small funds. But what do the terms small cap, mid cap and large cap mean? And what is the difference between big cap, mid cap and small cap? To understand these things, it's important to start at the basics and understand what the "cap" of the market represents. The technical definition of market capitalization, often referred to as Market Cap, is that it is the market value of a company's exceptional shares. In the simplest words, the market value of all the shares held by the shareholders of a company is known as the market capitalization which looks at a quick example to better understand it. Since there is a company whose shares are listed on a stock exchange. If the company has about 10 lakh shares currently traded at Rs. 500 each in the stock market, the market capitalization of that company would be Rs. 50 (10 lakh actions x Rs. 500 each). This should give you some insight into the formula for a company's market cap, which goes as below. Market capitalization = Total number of shares in circulation multiplied by the market price of each share based on market capitalization, companies are classifiedthree different categories: Small medium cap What are small caps, mid caps and large cap companies? And what is the difference between the big cap, the average hood and the small cap stocks? In the year 2017, the Securities and Exchange Board of India established rules to classify companies based on their market capitalization. This was done with the intention of maintaining uniformity in financial markets, in the context of investments and trading. Let's get in those details. According to SEBI rules, all companies listed on stock exchanges are classified according to their market cap. And the top 100 companies are ranked as large cap companies. So, what are big funds of caps? The Mutual funds investing in the actions of these large cap companies are classified as large cap funds. Large cap companies generally have an excellent track record. The market cap of these companies is generally significantly high, reaching approximately Rs. 20,000 crores or more. These titles are often included in market indices such as NIFTY and SENSEX, mainly because they command a very strong market presence. According to the SEBI classification, companies ranked from 101 to 250 in terms of market capitalization are known as medium-range companies. Their market cap tends to vary from Rs. 5,000 to Rs. 20,000 crores. Since mid-range companies have a moderate to strong market presence, they may or may not be widely included in broad market indices. The SEBI rules state that all companies that are ranked by the 251th position forward in terms of market capitalization are automatically classified as small businesses. Small cap companies generally do not have a long record. These companies could be relatively new start-ups or are companies that are still in the development phase. In terms of market capitalization, these companies generally arrive under Rs. 5,000 crores. And consequently, these companies tend to enjoy little or no market presence, and so, they are mostly not included in broad market indices. Evaluate average and not very liquid growth Potential investment funds are higher. The Association of Mutual Funds of India periodically releases a list of shares according to their market capitalization, based on dataBombay Stock Exchange (BSE), National Stock Exchange (NSE) and Metropolitan Stock Exchange of India (MSEI). Before investing in mutual funds, make sure you get to check the most recent list to know the companies in which the funds invest your money, so you can check if they are aligned with your risk profile and your investment goals.
